You could also play up the rise of technology to counter the loss of magic. Maybe its fading from the world and new steampunk stuff is replacing it. You can also have the two working together with a mix of magic and tech combined to create things that wouldn't be possible. There are plenty of ways to use the concept.

But when magic becomes absolutely necessary for the setting, I balk. I was reading a collection called "Steampunked", back to front (for reasons I shan't go into), and of the first three I read, two were basically magic-dependent: in one the steampunk tech was essentially powered by Wizard, and the other one is a magic-science conflict [1].
